Longevity and you

Longevity will change the way our society functions in the future.

We know the impact of longevity on society isn't just about older people. It will impact everyone.

We know that every girl born today will have a one in three chance of living until she's 100.

We know that when she starts work, she will need to save at least 20% of her earnings every year in order to afford a comfortable retirement.

We know that if she wants to buy her own home, she'll probably need to wait until she's over 35, in a relationship and working full time.

What happens next is where we come in.

Working with us

We use our expertise in demographic change to highlight the impact of longevity on society, working with experts, policy makers and practitioners to provoke conversations and pioneers solutions to create a society in which everyone can thrive, regardless of their age.

We work with businesses, charities and research institutions across a range of issues relating to longevity, whether looking at the impact of long-term health conditions, considering the future of pensions, or examining how the built environment needs to change.

We can work with you in a range of ways. We specialise in:

- research, undertaken by our in-house team of expert researchers and drawing on our wider network of experts from academia, industry, policy and politics
- influencing, understanding the public policy context and developing a clear analysis of what needs to change
- convening, bringing together policy makers, decision takers and practitioners from across government, business and the third sector to make change happen

Our recent work includes

- working with a trade association on a projection of future demand for mortgages among older people
- working with a leading ageing charity on a project exploring the impact of migration on the future care workforce
- working with a global insurer on a project to identify the savings gap across the OECD

International Longevity Centre UK

The ILC is the UK's specialist think tank on the impact of longevity on society, and what happens next.

We believe society has to adapt now so we can all enjoy the benefits of longevity. We want a society that works for everyone, regardless of their age.

We know the numbers. We know the challenges. What happens next will define us for generations.
